“The last few BIFFs have each afforded us one great documentary (Non-Fiction Diary, Factory Complex), and 2015 proves to be no exception with the discovery of the timely Reach for the SKY, a compelling look at a common but disastrous problem at the root of modern Korean society - competitive education.

Constructed like a thriller and featuring a taut and ominous mise-en-scene, this joint production between Korea and Belgium is gripping from the start and builds to a devastating climax.”

“One of the documentaries that is sure to resonate at this year’s Busan International Film Festival, Reach For The SKY is as gripping as it is informative as it cleverly explores the Korean education system;

Reach for the SKY remains constantly engaging, even after the exam is over and results come out.”
Every year, on the 2nd Thursday of November, the entire country of South-Korea is put to the test. That day, more than half a million senior high school students take part in the National Exam, better known as Suneung.

‘Reach for the SKY’ tells the story of several South-Korean high school students, their families and teachers, as they prepare for the annual National Exam. The exam will not only determine where the high school seniors will attend university but ultimately also their status in the Korean hierarchical society.

On the morning of Suneung, companies – even the Korean stock market – open up for business an hour later than usual to reduce traffic jams. Those students who do get stuck in traffic can dial 112, a number normally reserved for emergencies, to get a special police escort to their school. In some parts of the country, military police vehicles, ambulances, and food delivery motorcycles have reportedly been deployed to accommodate the most desperate of students.

That day, few planes are allowed to land or take off, so students can fully concentrate on the listening tests of the examination. Parents flock to the exam centres where they spend most of the day praying while holding on to the closed school gates. Some can be found praying at Buddhist temples with their child’s photo and exam day identification form lain on the temple floor.

Months or even years before the exam takes place, Korean students often live a life of strict routine. On an average day they get up as early as 6am to go to school. When school is finished, they then attend a hagwon, a private academy, where they are primed for the big day for months in a row. Usually the school day comes to an end when they arrive home well after midnight.

Suneung isn’t a regular high school test. The test will not only determine where the high school seniors will attend university but ultimately also their status in the Korean hierarchical society. At the most prestigious universities, spaces for freshmen are very limited, with chances of acceptance being less than 1%. Getting into a university with a good reputation is one of the most competitive experiences Korean students will ever experience in their life.

“We all have dreams, right?
I just wish we could have more time searching for what we really want to do, instead of staying in school that late.”

- Park Yo Han - 17 year old student -
Hyunha is a ‘repeater’. She took the Suneung exam in 2012 but her results were not satisfactory so she decided to take the exam again. Her parents are paying a lot for her tuition at the Eetos Private Academy, a school where she is being prepped intensively for the upcoming Suneung Exam. She spends most of her time in the school, from early morning till late at night. She wishes she could spend more time with her family.

Hyunha is very intelligent but also a dreamer. She doesn’t like the Korean education system at all and wants to change it. Her dream is to become the Minister of Education so she can completely reform the system.

Min-Jun is 19 years old, soft-spoken, and hails from Daejeon, a city about 150km from Seoul. His results on the Suneung exam were mediocre, so he convinced his parents to send him to a secluded and remote private boarding school in Gyonggi Province. Away from his family and friends and disconnected from the outside world, he will spend 9 months following a spartan study schedule in order to prepare himself for the final exam once more.

Min-Jun’s mother is a devout Buddhist. Every other week, she climbs the mountain to the local temple, together with his grandmother, to pray that her son would get a good score this time around. Min-Jun doesn't want his mother to be so worried about his school results but realises that his parents have high expectations of him.
Hye-In is a 17 year old girl from a middle-class family. She is a ‘gosam’, a senior high school student who will take the Suneung exam for the first time. Her father and mother run a funeral parlour. Hye-In is interested in teaching Korean to foreigners and would like to study at the Hankuk University of Foreign Language.

Her parents nor her teachers in high school know enough about the complexity of the university application process, so Hye-In feels lost. In an attempt to make sense of it all, she seeks consultancy at several private institutions, but even there she doesn’t seem to find the right answer. She often feels that she spends more time gathering information about the right application procedures than focusing on studying itself. More so, the whole ordeal drains her energy and generally leaves her confused.

Kim Ki-Hoon is the living proof that education is a serious business in South-Korea. Sometimes labeled as a ‘celebrity teacher’, he teaches English at Megastudy, one of the biggest private education institutions, and runs his own textbook publishing company.

Over 1.5 million students have bought his online lectures. In 2012, he made over 9.5 million US dollars, which is in stark contrast to the wages of his colleagues in government schools. Every year he writes his own song and makes a music video to support and encourage his students who have to sit for the Suneung exam. He was recently interviewed by the Wall Street Journal and the Financial Times.

However, even teachers like Kim Ki-Hoon are struggling. Now that the government has started their own online tutoring (for free), private teachers and academies have to become even more inventive to keep their business up and running.
The above decision of the UN Committee reflects a core theme of our documentary: No matter how important education might be, it should never be at the cost of the self-development of a child. By taking away a child's right to play, its creativity is stifled. Ultimately, academic education should benefit and complement the development of a child, not restrict it.

Statistically it is clear that the pressure Korean students have to deal with is more than problematic. South-Korea has the highest suicide rate among the OECD countries. Between 2007 and 2009 suicide was the leading cause of death among students aged 15 to 24. Every month 2 students take their own life. 75% of students committing suicide are in high school.

The Ministry of Education is aware of the problems this overemphasis on credentials has created and has undertaken many attempts to reform its system but to little avail. The underlying cause of this is not to be found within a failing educational system, but in society as a whole. As long as a degree from a prestigious university is considered a status symbol by parents and a decisive requirement for employment little will change. A fundamental shift in mentality is needed, but it's quite clear this will not happen overnight.

‘Reach for the SKY’ is a documentary about a society where education has become a multi-billion industry because of its obsessions with achievement and status; about a culture where education has become as important as the type of car you drive or the size of your apartment; where mothers have become the educational agents of their children, micro-managing every hour that could be spent on studying.

But at its core, it’s a film about the right of every child to play and self-develop. After many years of intense studying, many teenagers are emotionally spent. One day they wake up, happy to learn they have been accepted to the university they wanted to get in so badly. They are confronted with the realization that they didn’t really know what they were studying for. For these students, reaching for the sky wasn’t so much a future dream, but merely a test score on a university application letter.
Steven Dhoedt (*1980, Gent) is a Belgian filmmaker, producer and cinematographer. He studied film at the RITCS School of Arts in Brussels and graduated as a Master in Audiovisual Arts.

After his studies he moved to Hong Kong, where he lived and worked for several years, gaining experience as a freelance producer and director. In 2003 he founded VISUALANTICS, a Brussels based independent production house, focusing on creative documentaries, fiction films and new media projects.

His films have screened on numerous film festivals all over the world and have been broadcasted on TV in over 30 countries. His work often deals with contemporary issues and subcultures, such as ‘INSIDE THE METAVERSE’ (2009), a journey through online virtual worlds or ‘STATE OF PLAY’ (2013), an intimate portrait of several South-Korean professional video gamers.

Wooyoung Choi is a freelancer director and a member of Indie PD in Korea. He has worked on more than 15 major television productions in Korea made for, sold to, Korean major broadcasters including KBS, MBC, EBS and TVN.

He directed his first 60-minute documentary, ‘Soul performance Gut’, supported by KBI in 2007. In the process, he is named one of the prolific directors in television documentary. Recent highlights include the documentary series, ‘Report in Samdong Elementary School for one hundred-eighty days (EBS)’, which suggest the interactive learning and observe students’ attitude for six months.

With Crossing Borders in 2010, he directs his first international documentary, ‘Here Comes Uncle Joe’.
